

WOMEN IN THEOLOGY

Dados Internacionais de Catalogação na Publicação (CIP)
(Câmara Brasileira do Livro, SP, Brasil)

Biffi, Verônica

Mulheres na teologia : vozes que Deus nunca silenciou : uma jornada fé, propósito e participação na missão de Deus / Verônica Biffi. -- 1. ed. -- São Paulo : Selo Universalidade da Bíblia, 2026.

ISBN 978-65-989210-4-0

1. Evangelização 2. Fé (Cristianismo) 3. Missão cristã 4. Mulheres na teologia 5. Mulheres - Aspectos religiosos - Cristianismo 6. Mulheres - Orações e devoções 7. Mulheres - Vida cristã 8. Mulheres - Vida religiosa - Cristianismo I. Título.

26-356131.0

CDD-230

Índices para catálogo sistemático:

1. Mulheres na teologia 230

Aline Grazielle Benitez - Bibliotecária - CRB-1/3129

Women in Theology - Voices God Never Silenced

A journey of faith, purpose, and participation in God's mission

Author: Verônica Biffi

Instagram: @veronica.biffi.eua @perspectiva.celestial

Editor: Tiago M. Burilli

Initial publication year: 2026

DEDICATION AND ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I dedicate this work to the Lord, who sustained me, guided me, and granted me the grace to turn this purpose into words. I also dedicate it to the women who love, study, teach, and proclaim the Word of God with faith, courage, and purpose.

I am deeply grateful to my husband, Silvio Henrique, for walking alongside me with love and encouragement, and to my daughter, Tiffany, for her sincere support and for celebrating every project born to serve God's work.

I am also grateful to Universalidade da Bíblia for opening this space of expression, faith, and service to the Kingdom.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

Introduction - 7

Chapter 1 | When theology seemed not to be a place for women -13

Chapter 2 | Imposed silence and the voices that remained -25

Chapter 3 | Jesus and women: the true model -33

Chapter 4 | Women who lived out theology in practice -41

Chapter 5 | Biblical examples of women raised up by God -51

Chapter 6 | Between resistance and the calling -61

Chapter 7 | Not rivals, but partners in God's mission -67

Chapter 8 | A theology that becomes life -75

Chapter 9 | Women today: faith, courage, and continuity -87

Chapter 10 | Called to proclaim -97

Conclusion | When God calls, He equips -107

Challenges and Reflections | When God calls, He equips -113

“God raised up women who heard His voice, understood His will, and actively participated in the history of salvation.”

INTRODUCTION

BETWEEN SILENCE AND THE CALLING

“For God's gifts and his call are irrevocable.” (Romans 11:29)

The empowerment of women in the field of Theology marks a significant point in an area that, throughout history, has been predominantly occupied by men and shaped by patriarchal structures. This reflection is not built against men, but in favor of restoring a biblical partnership, in which men and women cooperate together in fulfilling God's purpose. Throughout history, however, this field was marked not only by institutional structures, but also by symbolic constructions that influenced the way God, faith, and the Christian experience itself were understood and taught.

Religious patriarchy became established as a system often seen as natural or even divinely ordained, in which men occupy positions of authority and are recognized as the primary agents of theological interpretation. Within this structure, androcentrism, which is the way of seeing the world by placing man at the center of everything, came to influence not only language but also the way faith was understood over time. This means that many central concepts of Christian life, such as God, sin, redemption, Church, and mission, were defined from a predominantly male perspective, shaping the way we think, teach, and live theology to this day.

This reality not only organized theological thought but also delimited spaces, determining who could speak, teach, and actively participate in building knowledge about God. As a consequence, women were, in many moments, pushed to the margins of this process, their contributions minimized or silenced.

However, the feminine presence never ceased to exist. Even amid structural limitations, women continued to experience, express, and transmit faith in different contexts — often outside the formal spaces recognized by institutional theology. Their experiences, even when not always named or recorded, carry profound meanings that challenge traditional ways of understanding theological practice.

The inclusion of women in Theology, therefore, cannot be understood merely as the occupying of previously established spaces. Going beyond this perspective means recognizing that there are deeper issues involved, related to the very way society, faith, and religious structures were built over time. It is an invitation to reflect on the foundations that sustain these structures and on the need for transformation that is not only external, but also conceptual.

In this sense, Feminist Theology emerges as an important turning point. It is not limited to the academic field, but reaches symbolic, spiritual, liturgical, and existential dimensions, bringing to light themes that have historically been ignored or neglected.

In doing so, it broadens the horizon of theological reflection and opens space for new questions, new readings, and new ways of understanding God's action in history.

Even so, it is important to recognize that the feminine presence, by itself, does not guarantee structural change. Even with the growing number of women active in theology and in churches, challenges remain related to inequality, exclusion, and the need to transform the symbolic and relational structures that sustain these realities.

In light of this, a central question arises: what kind of critical analysis is needed to understand and confront the patriarchy and misogyny that were historically shaped by Christian tradition? And, from that understanding, how can we promote participation that is more just, inclusive, and coherent with the message of the gospel?

This book is born of that tension, between what has been established throughout history and what still needs to be revisited. Rather than offering ready-made answers, it proposes a path of reflection, dialogue, and rediscovery.

Because talking about women in theology is not merely discussing space, but recognizing stories, experiences, and voices that, even when silenced, never ceased to exist.

And perhaps, by looking more closely at these voices, we can understand that theology has always been broader, more alive, and more present than we imagined.

“The silence that was imposed did not stop God from continuing to raise up women.”

CHAPTER 1

When theology seemed not to be a place for women

“So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them.” (Genesis 1:27)

There was a time, and in many contexts there still is, when theology seemed not to be an accessible space for women — not necessarily because of an explicit and universal prohibition, but because of a silent, continuous, and deeply rooted construction that, over the years, shaped perceptions, limited possibilities, and, above all, influenced the way many women came to see themselves within God's purpose, not only in terms of knowledge, but also of authority, voice, and participation in the mission He established from the beginning.

This limitation rarely came with a direct sentence saying “this is not for you,” because most of the time it manifested more subtly, through environments, examples, structures, and even silences that, repeated over time, ended up communicating something even deeper than words could say, generating within many women a feeling that was hard to explain but very real — that this space did not fully belong to them, that there was a defined but limited place, and that crossing that limit could mean inadequacy, exposure, or even rejection.

Over time, this external perception stopped being merely a reflection of the environment and became an internal conviction, almost imperceptible yet extremely powerful, because it was no longer necessary for anyone to say there was no space, since the woman herself had already learned, even unconsciously, not to put herself forward, not to see herself in that place, not to consider herself capable, prepared, or authorized to walk in areas involving teaching, biblical depth, theological reflection, or spiritual leadership — not for lack of calling, but because of a construction that directly affected her identity.

And perhaps this is one of the most sensitive points of this reality, because the problem was never the absence of a calling, but the way that calling was perceived, interpreted, or even silenced within one's own conscience, as if there were a distance between what God was generating within and what seemed permitted outwardly, creating a constant tension between what is felt and what one believes is possible to live out, between what is discerned spiritually and what is assumed in practice.

This tension does not arise only from institutional structures, though they carry their weight, but also shows up in family, social, and cultural environments, where expectations are formed, roles are defined, and limits are implicitly suggested, building a narrative that, little by little, is absorbed and internalized, until the woman not only lives within these limits but comes to believe they are natural, correct, and even spiritually necessary, when, in fact, they are often merely a reflection of human interpretations and not of God's original intention.

At the same time, while this limitation was being established outwardly and consolidated inwardly, something continued happening silently and often invisibly, because God never stopped speaking, never stopped calling, and never stopped shaping — even when there was no recognition, validation, or visible space for this process to manifest publicly — which reveals a profound truth that needs to be reclaimed: the calling does not begin when it is recognized by men, but when it is generated by God.

And it is exactly at this point that many stories begin to converge, because there are women who, even without naming it, without fully understanding it, and without having clear points of reference, carried within themselves a restlessness, a hunger, a spiritual perception that did not entirely fit within the limits they had learned, as if there were something greater, deeper, and broader than what had been presented to them, yet that at the same time seemed distant or even inaccessible.

This experience is not marked by rebellion, but by a kind of spiritual sensitivity that recognizes there is more in God than what had been experienced up to that point, and that, even without total clarity about how this manifests, there is a growing awareness that a relationship with God cannot be reduced to a passive, silent, or limited place, because He himself is the one who calls, reveals, teaches, and leads, independent of human structures that try, often without realizing it, to organize what should remain alive, dynamic, and led by the Spirit.

Looking at this scenario, it becomes evident that the issue is not simply historical or cultural, but deeply spiritual and rooted in identity, because when a woman stops seeing herself as someone who can know, discern, teach, and live out the Word fully, we are not merely facing a functional limitation, but a distortion of identity that directly affects her relationship with God, her sense of purpose, and her participation in what He is doing on Earth.

And this distortion is even more subtle because it does not present itself as something wrong at first sight, often being mistaken for humility, submission, or prudence, when, in fact, it may conceal insecurity, fear, a lack of belonging, or even a spirituality shaped more by environment than by revelation, which causes the woman to remain in a place that does not necessarily correspond to what God established for her from the beginning.

Therefore, before any external adjustment, it is necessary to recognize that there is an internal process that needs to be confronted and restored — not based on comparison, competition, or an attempt to occupy space, but from a reconnection with the truth that God does not distribute calling based on human approval, nor does He limit revelation by cultural criteria, but forms, calls, and sends according to His will, reaching each person in a personal, intentional, and profoundly transformative way.

And when this truth begins to be perceived, even if only at first, something changes within — not immediately, but as a progressive awakening, where what once seemed distant begins to become possible, what once seemed inadequate begins to be reconsidered, and what was once silenced begins, even if timidly, to find a voice — not as an attempt to prove something to someone, but as a response to what God had already been saying for a long time, even when no one was listening.

As this awakening begins to happen, even if silently and often alone, the woman finds herself before an internal process that can no longer be ignored, because what was once only a vague feeling begins to take shape, clarity, and even confrontation, revealing not only what was lived externally, but above all what had been built internally over the years — thoughts, beliefs, and perceptions that, even unintentionally, ended up limiting the way she positioned herself before God and before what He himself began to generate within her.

This process is not comfortable, because it demands more than understanding — it demands repositioning, and repositioning oneself before God often means revisiting what had been accepted as truth for so long, discerning what comes from a human construction and what, in fact, corresponds to God's will, and, above all, recognizing that not everything that was learned needs to be perpetuated, especially when it directly interferes with spiritual identity and the way the calling is lived out.

Throughout this process, it becomes evident that one of the greatest barriers is not access to theology, but the way it has been understood, because, for a long time, theology was associated almost exclusively with formal, academic, or institutional environments, which, although valuable, ended up creating the impression that knowledge of God belongs only to certain spaces or profiles, when, in reality, true theology is born from a relationship with Him, develops in daily living, and is manifested in the way faith is experienced, applied, and passed on.

And it is exactly here that something begins to be restored in a profound way, because when a woman understands that theology is not merely a field of study, but an expression of life, what once seemed distant begins to become accessible — not through ease, but through identity — since knowing God has never been a restricted privilege, but an open, continuous, and personal invitation, one that does not depend on position, title, or recognition, and that is legitimately manifested whenever there is surrender, seeking, and willingness to hear, learn, and live out what He reveals.

This understanding does not automatically eliminate all insecurities, but it redefines the way they are faced, because instead of paralyzing, they come to be confronted in the light of truth, and what was once seen as incapacity begins to be questioned — not by comparison with others, but from the understanding that God does not call someone to occupy a place where He himself is not willing to sustain, teach, and equip along the way.

At the same time, this internal movement begins to generate external changes, subtle yet significant, because the woman begins to position herself differently — not necessarily in immediate visibility, but in awareness, in conviction, and in willingness — no longer retreating automatically and beginning to consider that perhaps what she had always perceived, felt, and discerned was not inadequate, but simply had not been recognized in the environment she was part of.

And this shift in perception is essential, because it breaks with the logic that the value of the calling is conditioned by the space one occupies, when, in truth, the calling is validated by faithfulness to what God speaks, regardless of context, which brings freedom but also responsibility, since it is not just about accessing a new understanding, but about responding to it in a practical, conscious way that is aligned with what is being revealed.

At this point, it becomes impossible to ignore that what seemed not to be a place for women was never, in fact, a limitation established by God, but a construction that, over time, was accepted, reproduced, and, in many cases, internalized, which now demands not only recognition but transformation, because it is not enough to perceive that there was a limitation — it is necessary to decide not to remain in it, not out of resistance to the environment, but out of faithfulness to the calling.

And this decision does not happen impulsively, nor based on reaction, but as the fruit of a process in which the woman begins to align herself once again with the truth, recognizing that her identity is not defined by structures, opinions, or human expectations, but by the way God sees her, calls her, and leads her, which brings stability even amid possible resistance, misunderstanding, or lack of recognition.

From this alignment, something begins to take firmer and more conscious shape, because what was once doubt becomes conviction, what was once silence begins to find expression, and what once seemed distant begins to integrate into reality — not as a personal achievement, but as the manifestation of something that was always present, but that now begins to be lived out with clarity, responsibility, and intentionality.

And perhaps one of the greatest transformations of this process is realizing that it was never about occupying a space, but about embracing an identity, because when identity is restored, place stops being a barrier and becomes a consequence, and what once seemed inaccessible begins to become natural — not through human effort, but through alignment with what God had always established, even when it had not yet been fully understood.

Thus, what once seemed not to be a place for women begins to be reframed, not through external confrontation, but through an internal transformation that repositions, strengthens, and frees — not merely to know more, but to live, express, and actively participate in what God is doing, recognizing that the voice He raises does not depend on human permission to exist, but on a willingness to respond, remain, and walk in faithfulness to what has already been released in secret.

“Women were never absent from God's work; many simply had their voices silenced.”

CHAPTER 2

Imposed silence and the voices that remained

“So shall my word be that goes out from my mouth: it shall not return to me empty, but it shall accomplish that which I purpose, and shall succeed in the thing for which I sent it.” (Isaiah 55:11)

The silence that marked the path of many women within the context of faith was not always established by explicit prohibitions or direct statements, because, more often than not, it was built progressively, almost imperceptibly, through dynamics that shaped behaviors, expectations, and limits without the need for clear imposition, creating an environment where the absence of voice seemed natural, appropriate, and even coherent with what was understood as order, reverence, or spiritual structure.

Rather than a frontal blockage, what developed was a kind of continuous displacement, where women's participation was not necessarily denied, but redirected toward less visible spaces, less recognized and often disconnected from deeper theological construction, which, over time, not only restricted expression but influenced the sense of belonging, leading many women to position themselves in a diminished way — not for lack of capacity or calling, but through assimilation of an environment that, even subtly, communicated limits.

This assimilation did not happen uniformly or consciously, but was formed from references, practices, and experiences that, repeated over time, generated a kind of internal adjustment, where the woman learned, often without realizing it, how far she could go, what she could express, and in which areas she should remain more reserved, which caused silence to stop being merely an external condition and become an internalized posture, incorporated into the way of thinking, acting, and even relating to God.

Meanwhile, in a dimension that did not depend on these structures, something kept happening constantly and uninterruptedly, because God's work was never conditioned by human validation, and even in contexts where visibility was limited, revelation remained active, the calling continued to be released, and spiritual formation continued its course, often in invisible places, far from public recognition, but deeply rooted in personal experience with Him.

Within this scenario, the continuity of faith did not depend on visibility, but on conviction, and many women remained steadfast not because they found a favorable environment, but because they found God, and this difference completely changes the way we understand this journey, since it is not about a lack of opportunity, but about a faithfulness that sustains itself regardless of circumstances, revealing a depth that is not born of exposure, but of endurance.

Observing this process more closely, it becomes evident that silence did not eliminate the voice, it only changed the place where it was expressed, causing what could have been public to become intimate, what could have been recognized to become reserved, and what could have been amplified to become profound, which, although it limited visibility, also generated a consistency that would hardly have been built in environments dependent on exposure.

In many moments of this journey, what was not said outwardly found an echo within, generating an emotional experience that could not always be clearly explained, but that manifested as a kind of persistent restlessness, where the woman perceived that there was something inside her that did not fully match the place she occupied, as if there were a distance between what God was forming and what seemed possible to live, creating a scenario where the silence was not only circumstantial, but also experiential.

This internal experience, when prolonged, tends to produce questions that go beyond the environment, reaching identity itself — not in the sense of denying the relationship with God, but of questioning the legitimacy of what had been perceived, as if some kind of external confirmation were needed to validate what had already been generated in secret, which reveals how much the lack of recognition can influence the way a woman sees herself, even while her communion with God remains alive.

Rather than manifesting as a visible crisis, this process happens more quietly, leading to an attempt at self-adjustment, where the woman often reduces her own expression, limits her participation, and avoids advancing in areas where she senses a calling — not for lack of desire, but for not finding enough security to position herself, which shows how imposed silence, once internalized, can turn into self-restraint.

Even so, something in this journey does not fade away, because the relationship with God continues to be a point of support that prevents this process from becoming a complete estrangement, since the deeper the relationship, the harder it becomes to ignore what He reveals, and it is exactly this connection that keeps alive the possibility of transformation, even when the context offers no support for it.

From this point, a clearer perception begins to emerge that not every limit experienced corresponds to God's will, and this distinction is not born of an immediate reaction, but of a gradual maturing, where what was once accepted without question begins to be examined more carefully, allowing the woman to identify what was culturally constructed and what truly aligns with the truth revealed in Scripture and in experience with the Spirit.

This discernment does not lead to impulsive rupture, but to a conscious repositioning, in which the woman adjusts the way she perceives and moves herself — no longer conditioned by what she was permitted, but guided by what God has revealed, which creates a significant internal change, not always immediately visible to others, but deeply real for whoever is living this process.

Over time, what was once insecurity begins to give way to a firmer conviction, not based on comparison or external validation, but built from the consistency of a relationship strengthened in secret, allowing the woman to move forward, even in discreet but aligned steps, recognizing that she does not need to wait for ideal conditions to begin living out what has already been awakened.

At the same time, the expression of this voice begins to find paths, often outside traditional formats, arising in conversations, discipleship, close relationships, and everyday contexts, where theology stops being merely a concept and begins to manifest as life, showing that the absence of a platform was never a real obstacle, only a limited perception of where and how God acts.

Gradually, the silence that once seemed to define the experience begins to lose its weight — not because it ceased to exist completely, but because it no longer determines identity, and this change is decisive, for when identity is restored, the environment stops being the main factor and becomes just one of the contexts in which life with God is expressed.

With this understanding, the woman stops seeing herself as someone who was silenced and comes to recognize that, despite the limitations, her voice was preserved, strengthened, and aligned over time, which brings a new perspective on the entire journey, allowing her to see that what was lived in secret was never a loss, but a spiritual investment.

Thus, in concluding this process, it becomes clear that the voices that remained did not survive by chance, but were sustained by a living relationship with God, who continued forming, guiding, and preparing, until the moment came not only to remain, but also to move forward — not in search of recognition, but in response to a calling that never ceased to exist.

“Women were created by Jesus, loved, heard, entrusted, cared for, sent, accompanied, and never avoided by Him.”

CHAPTER 3

Jesus and women: the true model

“Soon afterward he went on through cities and villages, proclaiming and bringing the good news of the kingdom of God. And the twelve were with him, and also some women who had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities: Mary, called Magdalene, from whom seven demons had gone out, and Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod's household manager, and Susanna, and many others, who provided for them out of their means.” (Luke 8:1-3)

Looking carefully at the Gospels, it becomes impossible to ignore that the way Jesus related to women not only contrasted with the cultural standard of his time, but revealed, deeply and intentionally, the true nature of the Kingdom of God, where dignity, listening, revelation, and sending were not determined by human categories, but by the response to the Father and by an open heart to what He was doing.

Set within a context where women's participation was often limited to the domestic sphere and where their voice rarely occupied public spaces of teaching or influence, Jesus not only interacts directly with women, but establishes with them dialogues that carry theological depth, spiritual value, and transformative impact, showing that, for Him, there was no obstacle to revealing profound truths to those who were willing to listen, understand, and respond.

If there is one place where this truth becomes impossible to deny, it is in the way Jesus related to women. Not in theory, not in distant discourse, but in the living practice of encounters, in the way He looked, listened, taught, and positioned himself. Jesus never avoided women. He loved them, spoke with them, walked with them, trusted them, cared for them, and placed them in positions that, until then, had been denied to them by limited human structures. The problem was never with Christ, but with the later constructions that tried to diminish what He had already restored.

The encounter with the Samaritan woman makes this clear. In a context where Jewish men did not speak with women, much less with Samaritans, Jesus breaks cultural, religious, and social barriers to establish a profound dialogue. He not only speaks with her, but reveals to her spiritual truths that transform her identity and her story. And the result of this encounter does not end with her. Her transformation reaches others, because an encounter with Jesus never ends in itself — it always overflows.

In the same way, Mary, by sitting at Jesus's feet, takes a place traditionally reserved for male disciples. And Jesus does not rebuke her. On the contrary, He validates her choice, acknowledges her posture, and affirms that she chose the better part. There, once again, He breaks with established patterns and shows that access to teaching, listening, and spiritual formation is not limited by gender, but open to those who respond to the call. And when we come to the most central moment of the Christian faith, the resurrection, it is women who are the first witnesses of the empty tomb. They are the ones who receive the message and are sent to proclaim what would change the history of humanity. In a society where a woman's testimony had no legal value, Jesus chooses precisely these women as bearers of the most important news of the faith. This is not a small detail. This is a statement.

When we understand this posture of Jesus, it becomes impossible to ignore one truth: God does not merely permit women to participate — He calls, equips, and sends. This is not about competing for space, but about recognizing purpose. It is not about power, but about the gifts God has granted to each woman. The Spirit that God pours out does not produce cowardice, but courage — courage to move forward, to take one's place, to live out what has been placed in the heart.

A woman is already doing theology when she cares, when she teaches, when she resists, when she evangelizes, when she prays, and when she remains faithful to the divine purpose. Theology is not born only in books or institutions; it is born in life, in experience, in the walk with God. Women make theology more human when they speak of God from their own lived experience, when they bring to the center what has often been ignored, when they reveal a God who is not distant, but present in daily life, in pain, in struggle, and in hope.

And this reality did not begin now. Since the Scriptures, God has been raising up women who carried authority, discernment, and direction.

Deborah did not merely give counsel — she judged Israel and led an entire nation through a moment of crisis. Esther did not merely occupy a position of influence — she used her position to save a nation. Hannah did not merely pray — she poured out her soul before God and experienced an answer that would change her story. The daughters of Zelophehad did not merely accept an imposed reality — they questioned it, took a stand, and brought about a change within the law itself.

These stories are not isolated exceptions. They reveal a pattern. Justice and covenant also pass through the feminine voice. God is not restricted by human structures; He acts through those who make themselves available, regardless of the barriers society tries to impose.

And that is why the Word remains alive. The Bible will always be relevant, because it is not merely a record of the past, but an ongoing revelation. We can read the same text many times and there will always be new understanding, because God continues to speak, continues to reveal, continues to bring light to what was once hidden.

Even today, this reality continues to repeat itself. The world insists on silencing, ignoring, and even erasing these voices. Many women still face resistance, devaluation, and limitations that do not come from God, but from human structures. Even so, God never falls silent. He continues calling, raising up, and using women who make themselves available to live out His purpose.

What is at stake is not merely space, but identity. Not merely recognition, but alignment with what God has already established. When a woman understands who she is in God, when she responds to the calling and takes her place, she does not only transform her own story, but impacts everything around her. Because an encounter with God is never sterile. It always bears fruit. It always reaches others. It always continues.

“A woman is already doing theology when she cares, when she teaches, when she resists, when she evangelizes, when she prays, and when she remains faithful to the divine purpose.”

CHAPTER 4

Women who lived out theology in practice

“And many Samaritans from that town believed in him because of the woman's testimony, ‘He told me all that I ever did.’” (John 4:39)

There is a limited understanding, often silently accepted, that theology belongs only to the field of formal discourse, academic settings, or institutional structures, as if knowledge of God were restricted to specific spaces and certain profiles. However, observing how faith is expressed throughout biblical history and the journey of God's people, it becomes evident that theology is not born first in books, but in life; it is not first established on platforms, but in processes; it does not develop only in teaching, but in the lived experience with God that transforms, sustains, and directs.

This reality becomes even clearer when we look at women's participation, because, even in contexts where their voice was not formally recognized, their lived experience with God produced understanding, discernment, and action carrying profound theological content, even if it was not named as such. Theology, in this sense, was not a title, but an expression; not an external recognition, but a continuous practice of faith, of listening, of response, and of steadfastness.

Throughout Scripture, we see that many women not only lived their faith, but interpreted, responded to, and actively participated in what God was doing, revealing that theology is not limited to what is systematized, but also to what is lived faithfully. Every act of obedience, every decision made in light of what God had revealed, every posture of faith in the face of adverse circumstances, carries within it an understanding of God that, even without technical language, is profoundly theological.

This perspective directly confronts the idea that doing theology necessarily requires an institutional space or formal recognition, because it shows that true theology is manifested in the way life is lived before God. It is not just about knowing concepts, but about responding to revelation, aligning decisions, sustaining convictions, and remaining steadfast, even when there is no visibility or validation.

In this context, it becomes impossible to ignore that many women fulfilled this role consistently, even if invisible to the eyes of structures that did not recognize their contribution. They taught, cared, disciplined, passed on faith, sustained spiritual environments, and influenced generations — not from titles, but from a life aligned with God. And this reveals that theology does not depend on human authorization to exist, because it is born from a relationship with God himself.

Another point that must be considered is that this lived experience not only expresses faith, but also builds understanding. The constant practice of listening, discerning, and responding to God produces maturity, produces spiritual perception, and produces an understanding that is not superficial. Lived theology forms convictions that do not depend on circumstances, because they were built through relationship and not only through theoretical learning.

This reality also reveals that there is a difference between speaking about God and living with God. While discourse can be learned, life with God is developed, is built, is deepened over time. And it is in this space that many women lived out theology consistently, because their faith was not based only on what they heard, but on what they lived, what they experienced, what they held onto amid pressures and challenges.

This is precisely why reducing theology to an exclusively academic field limits what God has always done in a broad and accessible way. Revelation was not given to be confined, but to be lived, shared, and multiplied. And throughout this history, women were not merely passive participants, but active agents of this transmission, even if, many times, without formal recognition.

This understanding broadens the way we look at what it means to do theology. It is not just about teaching, but about living; not just about explaining, but about manifesting; not just about knowing, but about remaining. And this completely repositions the role of women, because it reveals that they were not on the margins of theology, but within it, building, sustaining, and passing on what God was doing.

Considering all of this, it becomes evident that practical theology is not inferior to systematized theology, but complementary, because one without the other loses balance. Lived experience without understanding can become superficial, but understanding without lived experience becomes empty. And it is exactly at this point that the contribution of women reveals its depth, because they did not only live it, they sustained it; they did not only participate, they remained; they did not only listen, they responded.

Deepening this understanding, it becomes necessary to recognize that lived theology not only sustains individual faith, but also structures entire spiritual environments, often without visibility, without recognition, and without a name, yet with a direct impact on the continuity of what God is doing. There is a silent yet extremely powerful dimension, where faith is not expressed in public speeches, but in constancy, in care, in daily teaching, and in decisions that, repeated over time, build solid spiritual foundations.

This activity reveals that practical theology is not an abstract concept, but a reality embodied in daily life, where what is believed translates into how one lives, how one teaches, how one cares, and how one perseveres.

There is a strength in this perseverance that cannot be ignored, because it reveals a kind of maturity that does not depend on external recognition to exist. Remaining when there is no applause, continuing when there is no visibility, sustaining when there is no validation — all of this shows a faith that is not conditional, but rooted. And that root is, in itself, a theological expression, because it reveals an understanding of God that goes beyond circumstances.

Throughout this journey, this practice is also expressed in teaching, not necessarily within formal structures, but in the passing on of values, principles, and faith. Teaching, in this context, is not just about communicating content, but about shaping conscience, guiding decisions, and influencing generations. Every piece of guidance given, every correction made, every word released in light of what God has revealed, carries within it a theological content that shapes lives and sustains journeys.

Furthermore, care appears as one of the clearest expressions of this lived theology, because caring is not merely an emotional act, but a spiritual posture that reflects the character of God. Care requires discernment, requires sensitivity, requires responsibility, and all of this is directly linked to how God is understood. Whoever cares from a distorted view may even act, but does not transform; but whoever cares from an aligned revelation generates life, restoration, and continuity.

Another aspect that must be considered is that this constant practice forms an authority that is not based on position, but on consistency. Spiritual authority is not born from a title, but from the coherence between what is lived and what is believed. And this coherence, built over time, generates real influence, even if not formally recognized. It is an authority that does not need to be asserted, because it is perceived.

This reality also exposes an important difference between visibility and relevance. Not everything visible is profound, and not everything profound is visible. Many of the most significant contributions to the building of faith are not recorded on public platforms, but were lived out in simple settings, sustained by people who understood that the value of what they do lies not in exposure, but in faithfulness.

There is also a dimension of resistance in this practice, because remaining faithful in environments that do not recognize, that limit, or that devalue requires more than willingness — it requires conviction. And this conviction is not born of opinion, but of revelation. It is what sustains continuity, prevents abandonment, and keeps a person aligned, even when the context is unfavorable.

This resistance, however, is not marked by constant confrontation, but by quiet firmness, by a posture that does not bend, but also does not need to prove itself. It is an internal stability that allows one to continue without depending on validation, because it is already grounded in something greater than any human recognition.

At the same time, this lived experience reveals that practical theology is not limited to the past, but continues to be a current, present, and necessary reality. The same dynamic of living, teaching, caring, remaining, and resisting continues to be a legitimate expression of the knowledge of God today, and continues to be a space where women actively participate in the mission, even if not always recognized as they should be.

In light of this, it becomes impossible to reduce women's participation in theology to something secondary or complementary, because, in practice, it was always present, always active, and always contributed significantly. What was often lacking was not participation, but recognition. And this distinction is fundamental to understanding this reality correctly.

Thus, looking at the theology that is born of life, that is expressed in daily living, and that is sustained by faithfulness, it becomes evident that many women not only did theology, but continue doing it, building it, sustaining it, and passing on what God is doing — not from structures that authorize, but from a relationship that transforms.

And it is exactly this foundation that prepares the way to move forward even further, now looking at specific examples of women who not only lived this reality, but were clearly and expressly raised up, showing that what was lived daily also manifests itself, in many moments, in a visible and recognized way within the biblical narrative itself.

“They were the first to proclaim the central event of the Christian faith.”

CHAPTER 5

Biblical examples of women raised up by God

“Now Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of Lappidoth, was judging Israel at that time.” (Judges 4:4)

As we deepen our understanding that theology is not born only in discourse, but in life lived before God, it becomes necessary to look carefully at those biblical records where this reality is not only expressed, but recognized, narrated, and preserved. Scripture does not present women as peripheral or secondary figures within the history of salvation, but as active participants, directly involved in what God was doing in different moments, contexts, and seasons, revealing that their activity was not an exception, but an integral part of the divine movement.

Observing these stories, we see that God does not raise up people based on human criteria of visibility or structure, but based on purpose, response, and alignment. Each of these women carries a specific expression of God's action, not only because of what they did, but because of the way they responded to what was entrusted to them. These are not merely isolated events, but consistent manifestations of a God who calls, positions, and uses lives that are available, regardless of the limitations imposed by context.

This movement, when observed more deeply, is not only historical, but also epistemological. For a long time, theological construction was marked by a male centrality that defined not only the spaces of speech, but also the very concepts of God, humanity, sin, and redemption. Androcentrism not only organized structures, but shaped language and the parameters of theological thought, establishing man as the universal reference point. In this sense, recognizing the contribution of these women is not only about highlighting their presence, but also perceiving that, even within limited structures, their lives already expressed a living, embodied, and active theology, even if often not named as such.

Deborah stands out as one of these clear expressions, not only for holding a position of leadership, but for the way she exercised discernment, direction, and responsibility during a decisive moment for the people of Israel. Her role was not limited to one function, but involved judgment, guidance, and positioning, showing that her authority was not built by human recognition, but by an aligned relationship with God that produced clarity and direction. What stands out in her life is not merely the exception of a woman in leadership, but the manifestation of someone who heard, discerned, and firmly responded to what God was establishing.

Mary, the mother of Jesus, presents a different but equally profound dimension, where theology is expressed in the response to revelation. Upon receiving what was announced to her, her posture was not one of resistance, but of conscious surrender, revealing an understanding that goes beyond information and reaches the level of trust. Her willingness to participate in what God was doing was not limited to an initial moment, but extended throughout the whole process, showing that obedience is not just an act, but a steadfastness.

The Samaritan woman, already discussed earlier, reappears here not merely as someone who was transformed, but as someone who became a vehicle of continuity. Her story does not end with the encounter, but expands into testimony, showing that received revelation generates movement. The impact of her response is not confined to her own life, but reaches others, reinforcing that an encounter with God always carries within it a dimension that goes beyond the individual.

Mary Magdalene, in turn, carries one of the most profound expressions of closeness, perseverance, and testimony within the Gospel accounts. Her journey is marked not only by deliverance, but by the continuity of her presence alongside Jesus, culminating in the moment she becomes a direct witness of the resurrection. This detail is not secondary, but deeply revealing, because it shows that God's trust is not conditioned by what one was in the past, but by the response given in the present.

Moving into the context of the early church, we see this same dynamic continuing. Phoebe is mentioned not merely as a participant, but as someone who exercises service and responsibility, being recognized within the community of faith. Her presence is not decorative, but functional, revealing that women's activity did not cease with the Gospels, but continued in the development of the church.

Priscilla appears as an even more interesting figure in this context, because her role involves teaching, correction, and theological alignment. Alongside Aquila, she actively participates in the formation of others, showing that teaching was not a restricted sphere, but shared among those aligned with the truth. Her presence shows that theology was not only received, but also passed on through lives that understood what God was doing.

Junia, though mentioned only briefly, carries significant weight in being recognized among the apostles, which reveals that her role not only existed, but was perceived and valued within the apostolic movement. This recognition does not appear as an isolated detail, but as part of a reality in which God raises up and positions according to His purpose, not according to limited structures.

Observing these journeys, it becomes evident that these women's participation is not limited to presence, but reaches into the production and transmission of theological content. Even though they were often not formally recognized as theologians within institutional structures, their actions reveal interpretation, teaching, discernment, and the communication of truth. This directly confronts the idea that theology is restricted to academic or official settings, showing that it also develops through lived experience, practice, and response to revelation. This realization becomes even more necessary when we consider that, historically, women faced exclusion, silencing, and resistance within the formal spaces of theology, their contributions often minimized or ignored, even when present and relevant.

Considering these lives, it becomes evident that there is no single model of participation, but a diversity of expressions that point to the same truth: God raises up women in different contexts, with different roles and in different ways, but always with purpose. Some lead, others teach, others sustain, others proclaim, but all genuinely participate in what God is doing.

This diversity does not weaken this understanding — on the contrary, it strengthens it, because it shows that this participation is not limited to one specific format, but adapts to God's purpose in each context. What remains constant is not the form, but the principle: God calls, equips, and uses those who respond.

At the same time, these stories reveal that value lies not only in what is visible, but also in what is sustained over time. Not all had their names widely recorded, not all were recognized in the same way, but all were part of a greater movement, where God's action does not depend on prominence, but on availability.

This reality also raises a necessary tension. If Scripture so clearly reveals the active role of women in the development of the faith, why, at different moments in history, was this participation limited, reduced, or even silenced? Part of the answer lies in the structures built over time, where declarations of equality coexisted with exclusionary practices, creating a gap between what is affirmed and what is lived. Thus, more than recognizing examples, it becomes necessary to discern which structures still need to be confronted so that practice truly reflects the breadth of what has already been revealed in Scripture.

In this way, what is built by observing these examples is not merely a list of characters, but a broader understanding of how God acts in history. He does not limit, does not restrict, and does not silence what He himself decided to raise up. On the contrary, He establishes, sustains, and uses, revealing that what was often reduced by human interpretations was always present in divine practice.

And it is from this foundation that it becomes impossible to ignore a truth that runs through the entire biblical narrative and echoes throughout history: God never stopped raising up women, never stopped speaking through them, and never limited His action to the structures men tried to establish. What was often silenced in practice was never hidden in revelation. These voices are not appearing now — they were always present. What changes is not God's action, but our willingness to listen. And perhaps the greatest challenge is not proving that God calls women, but deciding whether we are ready to recognize, receive, and walk with what He has established from the beginning.

“Voice, recognition, dignity, and space are needed to contribute fully.”

CHAPTER 6

Between resistance and the calling

“For God gave us a spirit not of fear but of power and love and self-control.” (2 Timothy 1:7)

Considering everything observed so far, it becomes impossible not to notice that there is a constant tension between what God has always done and the way this, over time, was interpreted, limited, or even silenced within certain contexts. This tension is not born of an absence of activity, because the presence of women in the history of faith is evident, but of the way this activity was, in many moments, framed by structures that did not fully reflect the reality of the Kingdom.

This gap between practice and interpretation created a scenario where, although participation was real, recognition did not always follow, creating a dynamic in which many women continued living, teaching, caring, and participating in what God was doing, but without occupying the spaces of legitimacy that, in practice, already corresponded to their activity. This did not erase their presence, but created a layer of invisibility that deeply marked how their contribution was perceived.

Within this context, silencing should not be understood only as the absence of voice, but also as a limitation of space, a restriction of activity, and a devaluing of contribution. It is a broader process, where existence is not necessarily prevented, but its reach is reduced, its field of action is delimited, and, often implicitly, a boundary is set on how far one can go. This dynamic creates a barrier that is not always visible, but is felt in practice.

At the same time, it is important to recognize that this scenario did not produce absence, but resistance. And this resistance is expressed, most of the time, not through direct confrontation, but through steadfastness. Remaining in doing what needs to be done, remaining faithful to the calling, remaining aligned with what God has revealed, even when there is no proportional recognition — this, in itself, is a profound form of spiritual resistance.

This steadfastness, however, is not passive, because it requires conviction. One does not sustain something over time without clarity about why one is sustaining it. And this clarity is not born of opinion or the need for self-affirmation, but of revelation. It is the understanding that the calling does not depend on external validation that allows one to continue even in environments where recognition does not match reality. Along this process, many challenges arise, and one of the most significant is devaluation, which is not necessarily expressed explicitly, but manifests in small signs, in subtle limitations, in reduced expectations, and in spaces that are not fully opened. This does not prevent one's activity, but it demands a greater level of maturity so that this devaluation does not become an internal definition.

Another relevant challenge is the constant need to prove legitimacy, as if participation needed to be continuously justified. This kind of pressure creates exhaustion, because it shifts the focus from what should be central — faithfulness to the calling — to a continuous attempt at validation. And when this is not discerned, it can lead to a kind of burnout that is not linked to the work itself, but to the need for self-affirmation.

Furthermore, there is an internal tension that can arise in this context, especially when what is lived comes into conflict with what is externally recognized. The person knows what she is doing, knows what she is living, knows what God is generating, but does not find, in the environment, a proportional reflection of this reality. This can generate questioning, insecurity, and, in some cases, even withdrawal.

It is exactly at this point that the need for internal alignment becomes even more evident, because, without that alignment, the environment begins to define identity. When this happens, the person begins to reduce her activity, limit her response, and adjust her positioning not out of conviction, but out of adaptation. And this weakens what God is building, not because the calling changed, but because perception was affected.

At the same time, it is important to understand that not all resistance comes only from outside. In many cases, external limitations end up being internalized, creating internal barriers that begin to restrict even before the environment does. This happens when narratives repeated over time stop being merely external and come to be accepted as truth.

This internalization is one of the deepest challenges, because it does not present itself as opposition, but as distorted conviction. The person begins to believe she must not, cannot, that it is not her place — not because this was established by God, but because it was absorbed over time. And this requires an even greater level of discernment to identify and confront it.

In light of all this, it becomes evident that living out the calling in this context is not merely a matter of willingness, but of firmness. It is not just about continuing to do, but about continuing aligned, continuing aware, continuing positioned in what God established, regardless of external variations. And this firmness is not built in reaction, but in conviction. This conviction, in turn, does not generate rigidity, but stability. It allows one to move forward without needing to prove anything, to remain without needing to assert oneself, and to continue without depending on validation. It is a posture that does not deny challenges, but is also not defined by them, because it is grounded in something that does not waver.

And it is exactly from this point that it becomes possible to go even deeper into this reality, understanding how this tension between resistance and calling not only reveals challenges, but also forms maturity, positioning, and clarity about what truly sustains the journey.

“In the Kingdom of God, men and women cooperate in the same mission.”

CHAPTER 7

Not rivals, but partners in God's mission

“For just as the body is one and has many members, and all the members of the body, though many, are one body, so it is with Christ.” (1 Corinthians 12:12)

There is a silent distortion that, over time, has crept into the way many people see the relationship between man and woman within the faith: the idea of competition. As if the space of one canceled out the space of the other. As if the prominence of one meant the invisibility of the other. This logic is not born in God — it is born in broken readings, wounded structures, and interpretations that have lost sight of the center of divine purpose.

From the beginning, the biblical narrative does not present dispute, but partnership. Creation reveals a God who establishes complementarity, not rivalry. Man and woman do not appear as adversaries, but as a joint expression of the image of God. There is something in their union that more fully reveals who He is.

When this principle is lost, everything begins to fall out of alignment.

Throughout history, the relationship between man and woman was, at times, marked by tensions that do not reflect the heart of God. In some contexts, there was domination. In others, reaction. In many cases, the attempt to correct one error created another. And so, what should have been cooperation became veiled or open dispute.

But God's mission was never built on rivalry.

The Kingdom does not advance through competition, but through alignment.

Perhaps it is necessary to face this honestly: how many times, within faith communities, was the presence of women seen as a threat rather than a complement? And, on the other hand, how many times did the pain caused by this process produce a resistance that also broke the balance God intended?

This chapter is not a call for one side to defeat the other. It is an invitation for both to return to the center.

The divine proposal was never about superiority, but about function, purpose, and cooperation.

In practice, this means recognizing that there are differences — but these differences do not diminish, do not make inferior, and do not exclude. On the contrary, they enrich the mission. Each one carries aspects that, together, more fully reflect the Creator's intention.

Complementarity is not limitation. It is strength.

When we look at Jesus's ministry, this truth becomes even more evident. He did not operate within the structures of exclusion of his time. Nor did He create a movement of opposition between men and women. What He did was restore each one's place within God's purpose.

Jesus did not compete with structures — He revealed the Kingdom.

And in this Kingdom, women were present, active, engaged, teaching, learning, sustaining, proclaiming, remaining.

The problem was never women's participation. The problem was the way this was interpreted, limited, or distorted throughout the centuries.

It is important to understand that partnership does not mean the absence of order, just as order does not mean exclusion.

There is a balance that needs to be recovered.

And this balance is not born from modern ideologies, nor from historical reactions. It is born from the very essence of God's design.

Perhaps you, reading this, carry experiences of your own. Some positive, others painful. Environments where there was space. Others where there was imposed silence. None of these experiences can be ignored — but neither can they define what God has established as truth.

The starting point must always be the same: returning to what God said, did, and established.

When men and women walk out of alignment, the mission suffers. When they walk in unity, the Kingdom advances with more clarity, strength, and expression.

This is not merely a theological idea. It is a practical reality.

Communities where there is healthy partnership better reflect the character of God. Ministries where there is mutual honor produce more fruit. Environments where each person occupies their place without dispute generate growth, maturity, and continuity.

The absence of this partnership, on the other hand, generates wear, division, and stagnation.

It is not about occupying space. It is about fulfilling purpose.

And purpose is not fulfilled alone.

There is something deeply spiritual about the ability to recognize the value of another person without feeling diminished. This requires maturity, identity, and understanding of one's own calling. Where there is insecurity, competition is born. Where there is identity, collaboration is born.

This is a central point.

Secure men do not need to diminish women to affirm themselves. Aligned women do not need to compete to exist. When both are positioned in God, the relationship stops being a dispute and becomes a joint building.

Perhaps here lies one of today's greatest challenges: rebuilding a vision that was fragmented.

It is not about going back to the past, nor about adopting distorted models of the present. It is about recovering the original principle.

And this requires a willingness to revisit concepts, to open space for dialogue and, above all, to allow God to reorganize what became misaligned over time.

Can you see how this changes everything?

The way we lead changes. The way we serve changes. The way we teach changes. The way we see one another changes.

Where there is partnership, there is flow. Where there is rivalry, there is resistance.

And God's mission was not designed to be heavy, stuck, or divided.

It was built to be shared.

There is a beauty in this that often goes unnoticed: God did not choose to work alone, nor did He choose for only one group to reflect His purpose. He decided to involve people, different from one another, but united in the same calling.

This includes men and women.

To ignore this is to limit the expression of the Kingdom itself.

Recognizing this broadens our vision and allows the mission to be lived out more fully.

Perhaps, at this point, a direct question is important: have you been living your faith as partnership or as comparison?

Because the answer to that reveals far more than it seems.

God's mission does not need competitors. It needs aligned people.

And alignment begins in the heart.

“We need to broaden our view of theology so that it becomes practical, compassionate, and transformative.”

CHAPTER 8

A theology that becomes life

*“But be doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves.”
(James 1:22)*

Throughout this journey, it becomes increasingly evident that theology was never intended by God to be an exercise distant from reality, restricted to discourse, academic settings, or intellectual constructions disconnected from daily life. From the beginning, knowledge of God has always been deeply connected to the way one lives before Him, because in God's design, knowing and living are not separate dimensions, but expressions of the same truth.

When this understanding is lost, theology runs the risk of becoming mere content, accumulated information, organized concepts that do not move the heart or transform practice. And in this scenario, something essential is lost, because faith stops being experience and becomes mere discourse, ceasing to produce what it was called to generate.

The purpose of this chapter is not to present a new definition of theology, but to reclaim what has always been present, even if often neglected: a theology that becomes life, that is expressed in choices, in attitudes, in relationships, and in the way God's purpose is lived out daily.

It is at this point that women's presence in theology reveals itself even more profoundly, because, throughout history, many women did not have access to formal spaces of teaching, but never stopped living out their faith in a practical, consistent, and transformative way. This was not a circumstantial adaptation, but a genuine expression of a theology born from life and returning to life.

Perhaps you have already noticed that, often, what impacts us most is not elaborate speeches, but lives that reflect what they believe. There is a quiet authority in coherence, a strength that does not depend on external recognition, but is sustained by lived truth. This is theology that does not need to be proven, because it is perceived.

When we speak of a theology that becomes life, we are speaking of a continuous movement, where learning, teaching, caring, resisting, praying, and living out purpose are not isolated activities, but integrated dimensions of the same journey.

These are not separate functions, but different expressions of the same commitment to God.

Teaching, in this context, is not limited to formal settings or specific positions, but is expressed whenever truth is shared with the intent to build up, guide, and strengthen. Many women did and continue to do this daily, often without a title, without institutional recognition, but with a real impact on the lives of people around them.

Caring also becomes a theological expression when it flows from an understanding of who God is, reflecting His character in concrete actions. Care is not merely a relational trait, but a manifestation of one's understanding of God, because whoever knows His heart begins to act in a similar way.

Evangelizing, in turn, stops being merely a one-time activity and becomes a natural extension of a transformed life. When faith is lived authentically, it overflows, and that overflow does not depend on platforms, but on availability. It is life that proclaims, even before words do.

Resisting is also part of this living theology, especially when we consider the contexts in which many women needed to remain firm even amid limitations, silencing, and challenges. This resistance is not merely a reaction, but an expression of faithfulness to the calling, a conscious choice not to give up what God has established.

Praying, along this path, is not a last resort, but the foundation of everything, because it is in prayer that the relationship with God is sustained, deepened, and renewed. A theology that does not pray loses its root, because it disconnects from the source. On the other hand, when prayer takes its rightful place, everything else falls into alignment.

Living out purpose, then, becomes the synthesis of all this, because it is not just about understanding what God wants, but about responding to it with one's own life.

And this response does not happen all at once, but over time, in daily decisions, often simple, yet deeply meaningful.

Perhaps, as you read this, you wonder where you fit within this reality, and that is an important question, because a theology that becomes life is not something distant, reserved for a few, but a possibility accessible to all who decide to live aligned with God.

It is not necessary to occupy great spaces to live out this theology. Public recognition is not required for it to be real. What is required is a willingness to live consistently with what one believes, even when no one is watching, even when there is no applause, even when the path seems silent.

There is something deeply transformative when faith stops being merely something one says and becomes something one lives. In that place, theology takes on body, takes on form, takes on expression, and what was once only a concept becomes concrete reality.

Can you see how this changes the way you look at your own journey?

Because, in this scenario, there is no separation between what is believed and what is lived, and it is exactly this integration that sustains a mature, consistent faith capable of generating impact over time.

Continuing this understanding requires realizing that a lived faith is not limited to specific moments, but runs through one's whole existence, reaching decisions, priorities, relationships, and even the way one faces what is difficult. Theology that becomes life is not manifested only when everything is aligned, but especially when circumstances challenge what is believed, because that is exactly where truth stops being merely stated and becomes sustained.

Along the journey, it becomes clear that living what one believes involves constancy, and constancy is not the absence of challenges, but perseverance despite them. Often, the depth of faith is not revealed in visible settings, but in quiet choices, in sacrifices no one sees, and in decisions that receive no recognition, yet keep the heart aligned with God.

It is in this place that theology reveals itself as real life, because it does not depend on favorable circumstances to exist. It is sustained by the conviction of who God is, regardless of the scenario.

As it is written: "Be doers of the word, and not hearers only, deceiving yourselves" (James 1:22).

This exhortation does not point to performance, but to coherence — to a faith that is not limited to hearing, but that expresses itself in living.

Perhaps it is important to recognize that, at many moments, there is a tendency to separate the spiritual from the everyday, as if some spaces were more sacred than others, but that was never God's proposal. When theology becomes life, there is no division between what is spiritual and what is ordinary, because everything comes to be lived before God.

This transforms the way one handles responsibilities, relationships, and even internal processes. What might once have been seen as mere routine comes to be understood as an opportunity to live out purpose, and what once seemed small comes to carry meaning.

Have you noticed how small decisions reveal great convictions?

The way one responds to a difficult situation, the way one treats someone in a moment of tension, the choice to remain firm when it would be easier to retreat — all of this reveals whether faith is merely in words or has, in fact, become life.

There is a depth to this that cannot be ignored, because living out theology requires more than understanding; it requires continuous surrender. As it is written: “Whatever you do, work heartily, as for the Lord and not for men” (Colossians 3:23).

This principle shifts the focus away from human approval and repositions the motivation in the relationship with God.

Looking at the journey of many women throughout history, it becomes evident that this lived experience was not built in ideal environments, but in often challenging contexts, where remaining required more than intention — it required conviction. The practice of faith revealed itself in perseverance, in faithfulness, and in a constant willingness to continue, even when there was no external recognition.

This reality remains present today.

Living out a theology that becomes life does not mean the absence of limitations, but the decision not to let those limitations define the relationship with God. It is choosing to remain when it would be easier to walk away, to continue when it would be more comfortable to stop, and to trust when there are no visible guarantees.

There will be moments when this choice is a lonely one, and it is important to say this clearly, because the surrounding environment will not always understand this kind of positioning. Even so, the journey does not depend on external validation, but on internal faithfulness.

You, reading this, may be exactly in that kind of process, where living what you believe requires more than words, and in that place, the question stops being about recognition and becomes about alignment.

Theology that becomes life is also expressed in the ability to keep learning, because living out faith does not mean stagnation, but continuous growth. There is always more to understand, more to adjust, more to mature, and this movement does not weaken faith, but strengthens it.

As it is written: “But grow in the grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ” (2 Peter 3:18). This growth does not happen automatically, but intentionally, and involves a willingness to keep being shaped, even when this confronts previous perceptions.

Another essential aspect of this journey is integrity, because when theology becomes life, there is no room for duplicity.

What is lived in public and what is lived in secret move in the same direction, and this coherence sustains the authenticity of faith.

It is not about perfection, but about constant alignment.

When there is a mistake, there is a return. When there is a failure, there is an adjustment. When there is a fall, there is a fresh start. This dynamic does not weaken the journey, but makes it real, because it acknowledges continual dependence on God.

The practice of this theology also affects the way one influences other people, because a coherent life teaches, even without words. There is something powerful about a lived faith that inspires, encourages, and guides, not by imposition, but by example.

Have you ever been impacted by someone who perhaps never held a position of prominence, but whose life spoke louder than any speech?

That is the strength of a theology that becomes life.

It does not depend on visibility, but on truth. It is not sustained by recognition, but by coherence. It does not seek prominence, but generates impact.

In the end, what remains is not merely words spoken, but lives that reflected what they believed.

And this is the continuity of the mission, because faith that becomes life does not end with the one who lives it, but reaches others, crosses generations, and remains as a testimony.

Living this way is not a restricted calling, but an open invitation, and it remains available, every day, in every decision, in every choice, and in every opportunity to align what is believed with what is lived.

“Jesus always listened to women, and through them He did theology and made history.”

CHAPTER 9

Women today: faith, courage, and continuity

“Charm is deceitful, and beauty is vain, but a woman who fears the Lord is to be praised.” (Proverbs 31:30)

Reaching this point in the journey requires looking at the present with clarity, without losing sight of everything already built throughout history. It is not just about acknowledging the past, but about understanding how it echoes in the current reality, influencing perceptions, opportunities, and challenges that remain present in the lives of many women walking in faith.

Times have changed, contexts have transformed, but some tensions still remain, sometimes explicitly, other times more subtly. There are undeniable advances, spaces that have expanded, voices that today are heard more often, but this does not mean the path is fully aligned with what God has always established.

That is why speaking about women today is not just describing a reality, but discerning a season.

Discerning the season requires sensitivity, because not everything that looks like progress necessarily represents alignment, and not all resistance means stagnation. There are nuances that need to be considered, processes underway, and a calling that remains active, crossing cultures, generations, and different contexts.

Perhaps you have already noticed that living out faith today involves challenges that are not exactly the same as those of other times, but that still require positioning, courage, and steadfastness. In many cases, what changes is not the essence of the calling, but the environment in which it must be lived.

At the same time that there is openness in some spaces, there are also new kinds of pressure, new forms of comparison, and new expectations that often try to redefine identity based on external standards.

And it is exactly at this point that clarity becomes indispensable.

When identity is not anchored in God, any environment can become a place of confusion, because what comes from outside begins trying to define what should come from within. That is why, more than ever, it becomes necessary to return to the essence — not as a return to the past, but as an alignment with what remains.

As it is written: “Charm is deceitful, and beauty is vain, but a woman who fears the Lord is to be praised” (Proverbs 31:30). This principle is not bound to a specific culture, but reveals a foundation that transcends time: lasting value is not determined by external standards, but by a heart aligned with God.

Observing the current reality, it becomes evident that many women live an active, present, relevant faith, even if not always recognized in every setting. There are women teaching, caring, discipling, leading, serving, and remaining, often quietly, but with deep consistency.

This continuity is not accidental.

It is the fruit of a calling that was never interrupted — only, at times, not properly recognized. Even so, the mission continued, because what God begins does not depend exclusively on human validation to exist.

Can you see how this changes the way you look at the present?

Because, in this scenario, the issue is not only about space, but about faithfulness to purpose. The calling does not begin when there is recognition, nor does it end when there is resistance. It remains, regardless of circumstances.

It is necessary to recognize that today's challenges also include distractions that can divert focus. In a time when visibility is often valued, there is a risk of confusing relevance with exposure, and exposure with purpose.

Not everything that is seen is, in fact, meaningful.

And not everything meaningful will be visible.

This distinction is essential so that the journey is guided not by external expectations, but by internal convictions. When this is not clear, comparison becomes inevitable, and comparison always distorts the perception of one's own calling.

Perhaps it is worth pausing to reflect: have you been measuring your journey by what you see in others, or by what God has been generating in you?

This question, though simple, reveals a great deal.

Because the continuity of the calling does not depend on comparison, but on perseverance.

Remaining, in this context, is not merely resisting, but continuing aligned, continuing faithful, continuing available, even when the scenario does not match expectations.

There is a quiet strength in continuity.

A strength that makes no noise, but sustains generations. A faithfulness that, often, does not stand out, but builds paths for others to walk afterward.

This is the reality of many women today.

Not as an exception, but as the continuous expression of a calling that transcends time.

Looking at different cultures and contexts, it becomes even more evident that this reality is not uniform. In some places, there is more freedom. In others, more limitation. In some contexts, there is recognition. In others, there is still significant resistance.

Even so, the calling does not adapt itself to the limitations of the environment.

It remains.

And it remains because its origin is not in circumstances, but in God.

This does not mean ignoring the challenges, but understanding that they do not define the reach of purpose. There are paths that still need to be built, spaces that still need to be opened, mindsets that still need to be transformed, and all of this is part of the process.

But, above all, there is a truth that must be held onto: the calling remains active.

And you are part of that continuity.

Perhaps not in the way you imagined, perhaps not in the shape you expected, but still, within a purpose that was not canceled, not reduced, and not forgotten.

Some battles still remain, sometimes explicitly, other times more subtly. There are undeniable advances, spaces that have expanded, voices that today are heard more often, but this does not mean the path is fully aligned with what God has always established.

There is also a contemporary tension that cannot be ignored: at the same time that there is openness in some spaces, there are new kinds of pressure, new forms of comparison, and new expectations that often try to redefine identity based on external standards.

When identity is not anchored in God, any environment can become a place of confusion, because what comes from outside begins trying to define what should come from within. That is why, more than ever, it becomes necessary to return to the essence — not as a return to the past, but as an alignment with what remains.

Observing the current reality, it becomes evident that many women live an active, present, relevant faith, even if not always recognized in every setting. There are women teaching, caring, discipling, leading, serving, and remaining, often quietly, but with deep consistency.

This continuity is not accidental. It is the fruit of a calling that was never interrupted — only, at times, not properly recognized. Even so, the mission continued, because what God begins does not depend exclusively on human validation to exist.

At the same time, it is necessary to recognize that today's challenges also include distractions that can divert focus. In a time when visibility is often valued, there is a risk of confusing relevance with exposure, and exposure with purpose.

Perhaps it is worth pausing to reflect: have you been measuring your journey by what you see in others, or by what God has been generating in you?

Because the continuity of the calling does not depend on comparison, but on perseverance. Remaining, in this context, is not merely resisting, but continuing aligned, continuing faithful, continuing available, even when the scenario does not match expectations.

There is a quiet strength in continuity. A strength that makes no noise, but sustains generations. A faithfulness that, often, does not stand out, but builds paths for others to walk afterward.

This is the reality of many women today, not as an exception, but as the continuous expression of a calling that transcends time.

Looking at different cultures and contexts, it becomes even more evident that this reality is not uniform. In some places, there is more freedom. In others, more limitation. In some contexts, there is recognition. In others, there is still significant resistance.

Even so, the calling does not adapt itself to the limitations of the environment. It remains. And it remains because its origin is not in circumstances, but in God.

This does not mean ignoring the challenges, but understanding that they do not define the reach of purpose. There are paths that still need to be built, spaces that still need to be opened, mindsets that still need to be transformed, and all of this is part of the process.

But, above all, there is a truth that must be held onto: the calling remains active. And you are part of that continuity.

Perhaps not in the way you imagined, perhaps not in the shape you expected, but still, within a purpose that was not canceled, not reduced, and not forgotten.

*“May every woman who carries this courage placed by God continue proclaiming His word — praising, preaching, teaching, interceding,
revealing, and leading.”*

CHAPTER 10

Called to proclaim

“And he said to them, ‘Go into all the world and proclaim the gospel to the whole creation.’” (Mark 16:15)

Everything built up to this point does not point to an accumulation of knowledge, but to a response, because understanding God's action throughout history always leads to a positioning in the present.

Proclaiming does not begin with words — it begins with awareness.

Awareness of who God is, of who you are in Him, and of the purpose entrusted to you within the mission. When this awareness is not established, proclamation becomes fragile, dependent on approval, conditioned by circumstances. But when there is clarity, what is proclaimed is born not of effort, but of conviction.

Throughout the whole journey presented in this book, it becomes evident that women were never outside of God's mission, even when they were pushed to the margins by human structures. The calling never ceased to exist — only, in many moments, it was not fully recognized. Even so, God continued calling, raising up, sustaining, and using the lives of those who decided to remain.

This brings us to an essential point: the calling does not depend on validation to be real.

Perhaps you have waited for some kind of external confirmation, some more obvious recognition, some clearer space to position yourself, but it is important to understand that, often, the calling manifests even before it is recognized by others. It begins in secret, in the intimate place, in what God generates within you.

As it is written: “Go into all the world and proclaim the gospel to the whole creation” (Mark 16:15). This instruction was not directed to a specific group within the Body, but to those who were reached and transformed. Proclamation is not an option for some, but a natural expression of anyone touched by the truth.

And it is exactly here that everything connects.

The theology that became life now becomes proclamation.

Not as an empty speech, but as a continuation of what has been lived, learned, and experienced. It is not about repeating words, but about communicating a reality already experienced in the heart.

Perhaps, reading this, you think of limitations, of contexts that seem not to allow this kind of expression, or even of insecurities that make this positioning difficult. These perceptions are real, but they are not determinative, because the calling does not adjust itself to limitations; it remains, even within them.

Can you see how this changes your perspective?

Because, in this scenario, proclaiming does not depend on great structures, but on willingness. It does not depend on platforms, but on positioning. It does not depend on visibility, but on faithfulness.

Proclaiming can happen in simple spaces, in everyday conversations, in attitudes that reflect what is believed, in decisions that point to God even without explicit words. There are many ways to proclaim, and all of them are connected to the same essence: revealing what God has already done.

At the same time, it is necessary to understand that proclaiming also involves responsibility, because what is communicated carries weight, influence, and direction. Therefore, it is not just about speaking, but about living consistently with what is proclaimed.

As it is written: “In the same way, let your light shine before others, so that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven” (Matthew 5:16). Light does not need to be forced — it needs to be revealed, and that happens when life is aligned.

This kind of proclamation does not merely generate information, but transformation.

Throughout history, many women proclaimed in this way, not necessarily occupying formal spaces, but living in such a way that their lives became testimony. This kind of proclamation cannot be silenced, because it does not depend on external permission.

Perhaps this is exactly the turning point of this chapter: understanding that you are not merely receiving a message, but being invited to take your place within it.

Not as someone who observes, but as someone who participates.

God's mission is not sustained by spectators, but by people who respond. And that response does not need to be grand to be meaningful — it needs to be true.

There is an active calling.

A calling that did not begin now and does not end here, but continues, reaching new people, new contexts, new stories. And within that continuity, you are not left out.

You are part of it.

Not by chance, not by adaptation, but by purpose.

Proclaiming is not an isolated event, but a constant expression of a life that was reached and transformed. It is not about specific moments, but about a continuous posture, revealed in the way one lives, speaks, and responds to the opportunities that arise along the journey.

This continuity does not happen automatically — it involves intentionality. There is a daily decision to remain aligned, not to stay silent about what needs to be communicated, and not to allow insecurities or circumstances to define the reach of what God wants to do through your life. This decision is not born of pressure, but of awareness.

As it is written: “For I am not ashamed of the gospel, for it is the power of God for salvation to everyone who believes” (Romans 1:16). This positioning is not the result of an absence of challenges, but of conviction — of someone who has understood the value of what she carries and, therefore, does not shrink back from the opportunity to proclaim.

At the same time, it is important to recognize that proclaiming does not mean occupying every space, but discerning which ones are part of the purpose. Not every place will be the setting for expression, and not every opportunity will be the right direction, which is why walking with sensitivity becomes essential. Proclamation born of alignment is not impulsive, but intentional.

Have you noticed how, in many moments, God opens simple paths that, at first glance, seem small, but carry deep potential for impact?

A conversation, a word released at the right time, an attitude that reveals care, a decision that points to God in the midst of an ordinary context — all of this becomes proclamation when it is aligned with what He has already generated within you.

Proclamation does not depend on complexity, but on truth.

There is also a dimension of perseverance in this process, because what is proclaimed does not always generate an immediate response. There are seeds that are sown and that will take time to bear fruit, and understanding this protects the heart from unnecessary frustration. The outcome is not under human control, but faithfulness in proclaiming is.

As it is written: “I planted, Apollos watered, but God gave the growth” (1 Corinthians 3:6). This principle repositions responsibility, reminding us that proclaiming is part of the process, but not control over the outcome. There is freedom in this, because it removes the weight of having to see immediate results and reinforces the importance of remaining faithful.

Another essential aspect is understanding that proclaiming also involves maturity, because what is communicated needs to be rooted, not merely known superficially. The depth of what is lived sustains the consistency of what is proclaimed, and that consistency is what builds credibility over time.

It is not about perfection, but about integrity.

Integrity between what is believed and what is lived, between what is proclaimed and what is practiced. When this coherence is present, proclamation stops being merely verbal and becomes existential, becoming visible in attitudes, choices, and the way one walks.

You, who have come this far, are not being called to something distant or unreachable, but to something that has already begun, even if you may not have fully realized it. Proclamation does not begin when you feel ready, but when you decide to respond to what God has already started within you.

This response can be simple, but it is not superficial.

It involves surrender, it involves willingness, and it involves trust, because there will not always be clear guarantees, but there will be direction. And direction, when it comes from God, is enough to take the next step.

As it is written: "Go therefore and make disciples of all nations" (Matthew 28:19). This instruction is not conditioned on ideal circumstances, but on obedience. And obeying, in this case, is not just about fulfilling an order, but about aligning one's own life with what God has established as mission.

In the end, it becomes evident that proclaiming is not about occupying a specific place, but about living positioned within purpose. It is recognizing that what was received is not meant to be kept, but shared — not out of obligation, but out of conviction.

The continuity of a story that did not begin now and does not end here, but that continues to be written by lives that decide to respond, remain, and proclaim. Within this continuity, you are not a spectator, but a participant — not as someone who merely heard, but as someone who now lives and communicates what she received.

“We can all be instruments of God, translating gifts into action, faith into practice, and life into words.”

CONCLUSION

When God calls, He equips

*“And I am sure of this, that he who began a good work in you will bring it to completion at the day of Jesus Christ.”
(Philippians 1:6)*

Reaching this point is not merely finishing a reading — it is recognizing that something has been awakened, reorganized, and, perhaps, even confronted within you. Each chapter was built not only to inform, but to reveal, align, and remind you of what never ceased to exist: the voice of God calling, sustaining, and leading women within His mission.

Throughout this journey, it became evident that silence was never the absence of a calling, but, often, the absence of recognition. Even so, God never stopped acting. He never stopped raising up women, trusting them, sustaining them, and including each one within His eternal purpose.

This changes everything.

Because, in this scenario, your value is not born from the space you were given, but from the calling God has already declared over you. Your voice does not depend on human permission to exist, because it was generated in God even before any structure acknowledged it.

Perhaps, at some point on your journey, you doubted this. Perhaps you questioned your place, your relevance, or even whether what you carry truly had space within the mission. These questions are not uncommon, but they are not the final truth.

The truth remains.

And the truth is that God never silenced what He himself decided to raise up.

As it is written: “For the gifts and the calling of God are irrevocable” (Romans 11:29). This means that what He began was not canceled, was not reduced, and was not forgotten. The calling remains, even when the environment does not keep pace, even when there is resistance, even when there is silence all around.

And it is exactly for this reason that this conclusion is not a final period.

It is a sending.

A sending to consciously live out what has been revealed, to remain aligned even when it is not easy, and to keep walking with the certainty that your place in God's mission is not accidental, but intentional.

You did not get here by chance.

There is a continuity that now passes through you.

A continuity that does not depend on perfection, but on willingness. It does not depend on visibility, but on faithfulness. It does not depend on approval, but on alignment.

Throughout history, women remained.

Even when they were not seen, they remained.

Even when they were not recognized, they remained.

Even when they were questioned, they remained.

And it is that steadfastness that sustains everything.

Because what remains in God is not lost, is not nullified, and is not erased. On the contrary, it grows stronger, expands, and reaches others.

Perhaps what you carry today does not yet have a clear shape, perhaps it is still in process, perhaps it is still being developed in secret, but that does not diminish its value, nor does it reduce the reach of what God is doing.

He continues calling.

And He continues equipping.

As it is written: "He who calls you is faithful; he will surely do it" (1 Thessalonians 5:24). The responsibility to fulfill it does not rest only on you, but on the One who called you. This does not nullify your response, but removes the weight of trying to sustain something that only God can sustain.

You do not need to prove anything.

You need to remain.

Remain in what God has spoken, remain in what He has generated, remain on the path He has pointed out, even when there are doubts, even when there is silence, even when the scenario does not match expectations.

Because in the Kingdom, what is generated in God does not depend on circumstances to exist.

And perhaps, more than anything else, this is what needs to be clear at the end of this journey: you are not trying to occupy a place, you are responding to a calling.

And responding changes everything.

It changes the way you walk, changes the way you position yourself, changes the way you see challenges, and, above all, changes the way you understand who you are within the mission.

You are not an exception.

You are continuity.

Continuity of a story that God began, sustained, and continues to write. A story where women were never silence, but were always voice, presence, and the living expression of God's action.

Now, that story continues in you.

And everything God begins, He himself sustains, guides, and completes.

Remain.

CHALLENGES AND REFLECTIONS

Reaching this point was not just reading. It was an encounter with truths that reposition identity, value, and purpose. Every chapter revealed that God never stopped calling, and that many limitations did not come from Him, but from interpretations that need to be confronted.

These reflections exist to lead you to look inward with honesty, recognizing what still needs to be aligned with God's truth. The challenges are invitations to move beyond theory and take a stand, responding to the calling with decisiveness. And the applications are simple, intentional steps that connect all of this to your real life.

Now, this part of the book is not about understanding more, but about living better. Because what God has already revealed only becomes complete when it finds a response in you.

The calling that was never silenced

Reflection Questions

1. In what area of my life have I stopped positioning myself, not for lack of calling, but for lack of confidence in myself?
2. Have I recognized God's voice, or have I let other voices define my place?

3. What has God already spoken to me that I still haven't had the courage to respond to?

Challenge Recognize that the silence you live in does not define the absence of a calling, but may reveal a pause in your response — and decide to reclaim the place God has already given you.

Practical Application

Set aside time for prayer and write down what you know God has already spoken to you, choosing one concrete step to begin obeying today.

Chapter 1 — When theology seemed not to be a place for women

Reflection Questions

1. What beliefs do I carry today that were formed by structures that limited me?

2. Do I have a sense within myself that certain places are not for me?

3. How much has my view of myself been shaped more by my environment than by God's truth?

Challenge Confront every limiting belief that was not born in God and decide not to keep living within patterns He never established.

Practical Application

List three thoughts that limit you and replace each one with a biblical truth that reaffirms your identity and value in God.

Chapter 2 — Imposed silence and the voices that remained

Reflection Questions

1. Have I been faithful to God even when there is no recognition?
2. Is my motivation to remain, or to be seen?
3. Do I value obedience in secret, or do I depend on external validation to keep going?

Challenge Choose to remain faithful to God in secret, regardless of recognition, understanding that the value of your life is not in visibility.

Practical Application

Practice an act of obedience to God that no one will see, strengthening your faithfulness without depending on the approval of others.

Chapter 3 — Jesus and women: the true model

Reflection Questions

1. Is my view of my own worth aligned with Jesus, or with human interpretations?

2. Have I truly allowed Jesus to redefine my identity and my place?

3. Is there any belief I need to deconstruct in light of the life and example of Christ?

Challenge Allow Jesus to be the only reference point that defines your identity, rejecting every distorted view built apart from Him.

Practical Application

Read a Gospel and observe how Jesus treated women, noting what this reveals about your worth before Him.

Chapter 4 — Women who lived out theology in practice

Reflection Questions

1. How much of my faith has been practical rather than merely theoretical?

2. Do my attitudes reflect what I believe?

3. What do I already know I should be living out, but have not yet put into practice?

Challenge Turn knowledge into practice, intentionally living out what you have already learned.

Practical Application

Choose one specific area of your life and apply a biblical principle concretely today, even if it's something simple.

Chapter 5 — Biblical examples of women raised up by God

Reflection Questions

1. Have I been comparing myself to other people's stories instead of discerning my own?
2. Do I recognize that God can use me within my current reality?
3. Am I available to God, or am I waiting for ideal conditions to begin?

Challenge Stop comparing yourself and embrace your own story as an instrument in God's hands.

Practical Application

Write down what you have today and begin serving with what is already available, without waiting for perfection.

Chapter 6 — Between resistance and the calling

Reflection Questions

1. Which has been stronger in me: resistance or the calling?

2. Have I given up when facing difficulties, or have I remained?

3. Is my identity firm enough to withstand opposition?

Challenge Decide to remain firm even in the face of resistance, strengthening your identity in God.

Practical Application

Identify a situation where you thought about giving up and choose to take one more step of faithfulness in it.

Chapter 7 — Not rivals, but partners in God's mission

Reflection Questions

1. Is there any feeling of comparison or competition within me?

2. Have I been able to celebrate the calling of other people?

3. Am I living in partnership with God's purpose, or trying to prove something to someone?

Challenge Reject comparison and align your heart with the Kingdom's vision of cooperation.

Practical Application

Encourage someone today in their purpose, celebrating what God is doing in that person's life.

Chapter 8 — A theology that becomes life

Reflection Questions

1. Is my faith visible in the way I live day to day?
2. Is there incoherence between what I believe and what I practice?
3. What needs to change today so that my life reflects my faith?

Challenge Align your life with your faith, eliminating inconsistencies and living with integrity.

Practical Application

Choose a habit that needs adjusting and start a practical change today, even if small.

Chapter 9 — Women today: faith, courage, and continuity

Reflection Questions

1. Am I aware that I am part of a story that began before me?

2. Have I been living with courage, or have I been retreating in the face of challenges?

3. What does God expect me to continue and not abandon in this generation?

Challenge Take your position with courage, understanding that your life is part of a greater purpose.

Practical Application

Take a visible step today toward your calling, even if simple, but intentional.

Chapter 10 — Called to proclaim

Reflection Questions

1. Have I been treating God's calling as a priority or as an option?

2. What is still keeping me from taking action?

3. What is the next practical step I need to take toward my calling?

Challenge Respond to God's calling with action, and stop postponing what has already been entrusted to you.

Practical Application

Set a clear step and carry it out today — something that moves you in the direction of your purpose.

Conclusion — When God calls, He equips

Reflection Questions

1. Do I trust more in my limitations or in God's ability?
2. Have I been letting fear paralyze me?
3. Am I willing to move forward even without feeling ready?

Challenge Trust in God's faithfulness above your limitations and decide to move forward in faith.

Practical Application

Pray, surrendering your insecurities to God, and take one practical step of faith, even without feeling fully secure.

Verônica Biffi

Contact: biffiveronica188@gmail.com

Site: <https://biffi.online>

Publisher:

Original Brazilian Portuguese edition cover

